Taylor City

On driving through the southwestern part of Ohio ten years after the graduation of the class of '40, we come to the model town, Taylor City. When we inquire as to the formation of this beautiful city, we soon discover that the class of '40 has had such varied occupations that it remained together and formed this city.

Driving down the main street, which is called Young Street, we see many names and faces familiar to us. Arriving at the business section we first see a large red, white, and blue sign indicating that we have now arrived at Crow's Barber Shop. We stop to talk to Don and find that he has been very successful. Adjoining Don's shop is the beauty salon of Ethel York and Mildred Gregston. These girls are still close friends and have a very fine business. We then go into the library on Sisson Street, and whom do you think we find? No other, than Alberta Brockhoff. She is still the quiet, pleasant girl that we knew ten years ago.

After leaving the library, we see that we're at the corner of Young Street and Balsley Avenue. We turn down this avenue and approach "Ye Olde English Tea Shop." Entering we soon are greeted by the pleasing voice of Mary Wymer, who is making a great success of her new venture.
